DESCRIPTIONS

What's unique is that this mighty mite gives you many of the standard fishing and comfort features that you'd expect on some of these larger craft, but delivered on a much smaller and more manageable package. Unlike some competitive 18-footers that might scrimp on free board, overall weight and beam, the Robalo R180 is a beast in her class, with an 18-degree aft dead rise, thigh-high gunwales, a full eight-foot beam and a net weight that tops 2,000 pounds dry and without power. Translated, you can take this downsized sport fisher into some agitated waterways that would send fear into other 17- and 18-footers but be rest assured that all will be good to go.

The Robalo R180 CC takes a classic center console design approach with a few interesting modern twists. Starting aft and working forward, the Robalo engineers figured out some interesting ways to give you more from less. The transom area is the epitome of this creative approach, offering a pair of jump seats for the crew to stay comfy when in-transit, with a handy 15-gallon recirculating live well set in between the port and starboard seating, both of which offer dry stowage areas down below. But when it's time to put the fishing rods to good use, both seat backs fold flush to create an elevated one-level aft casting platform that is just the ticket to fan-cast to schools of surfacing gamefish in your wake. Speaking of fishing rods, the R180 CC offers stowage for a total of 14 outfits, with a quartet of flush-mount rod holders mounted in the gunwales, two horizontal racks under each covering board, plus a six-pack of vertical rod holders split equally on either side of the console.

Yet another unique feature of the R180 CC is the fact that it offers a very roomy head area, accessed via a way-cool hinged companionway positioned in the front of the console that swings out to port and allows total unobstructed mobility to and from the head area that would fit a 350-pound NFL lineman. Going topsides, the large console features the usual amenities, including twin outboard accessory panels, a flush mount compass and room for twin engine gauges and a single large multi-function display for your marine electronics.

The standard leaning post with backrest is a nice touch for an 18-footer, as is the removable Igloo cooler set down below which will ice your drinks and lunch for the day, yet stay out from underfoot. Going forward, the raised forward casting deck hatch lifts up to reveal an insulated fish box down below, plus the flush anchor locker in the fore peak will hold a Dan forth-type hook and rode ready for immediate deployment when it's time to anchor over your favorite wreck or reef.
